

The popularity of active adult communities in Meridian, ID reflects the rapid growth in the area. What started as a quiet farm town in southwestern Idaho is now the state's second-largest city. The population is now more than 129,000 and is growing rapidly.

Builders are keeping up with the growth by providing homes tailored to various residents. Along with new housing communities, commercial and civic development is keeping pace through infrastructure improvements, downtown revitalization, and a good supply of new stores and restaurants.

To keep everything in balance and maintain Meridian's high level of livability, the city has kept an equally strong focus on creating dedicated recreational spaces such as Discovery Park, Settlers Park, and Julius M. Kleiner Memorial Park. City leaders have worked hard to maintain Meridian's traditional feel while promoting the benefits of more significant growth.

Active adults come to Meridian for all these reasons and more. Those still working can find good jobs while taking advantage of the Treasure Valley's recreational opportunities during their time off.
